

Iran HUMILIATES Trump! Fake Peace Deal COLLAPSES After White House Shooting

As a shooting rocked the White House, US president Donald Trump was busy playing a dangerous game with Iran, touting a fake peace deal for public consumption while preparing for all out war with the Israeli regime. As 30-plus gunshots rocked the White House and the 21-year-old gunman was allegedly unalived by the Secret Service, as all of this was happening, Donald Trump announced that a deal with Iran was imminent. And this all happened late on May 23rd. And even if you watch this and a deal has supposedly transpired, this deal is far from what meets the eye. Because how the United States has framed it, this memorandum of understanding, is that it has essentially bullied Iran into accepting U. S. terms, especially two main ones that the New York Times cited, which were the elimination of all enrichment and giving up the enriched uranium that Iran currently has in its possession, as well as returning the Strait of Hormuz back to the prior status quo before February 28th, when the United States and Israel launched their war of aggression.

Iran has already thrown cold water on all of this. They've said that the old order is completely done, the Strait of Hormuz will remain under its authority, and as this is recording, Iran and Oman are having talks about how they are going to actually administer the Strait of Hormuz for the long term. Again, the old order is over. And the nuclear file, the enriched uranium — Iran has made very clear, if they agree to any memorandum of understanding, it is going to have absolutely nothing to do with the nuclear file until they are able to negotiate negotiations on other issues. There were some who were intimating in the U.S. political establishment that Iran was also going to abandon their allies. Not true. Iran has firmly and seemingly won the concession that Lebanon will indeed, actually this time around, be included in the extension of any kind of pause.

But Iran has also made clear that they're not interested in pauses, and they're not even interested in concessions. They are only interested in securing their rights and the rights of the region for peaceful development and stability. So Donald Trump made this announcement. He said he talked to all the Gulf leaders, and all the Gulf leaders had urged him to take part in these negotiations, and that he told them that he did take part in these negotiations and that they are going to be bearing major fruit imminently. And he called Netanyahu and told him that this was going to happen, that the final parts of this deal were going to be negotiated. And as this was all happening, the Zionist establishment was losing their minds.

You had Eli David, you had Mark Levin, you had Ted Cruz, you had the entire... you had the Lindsey Grahams of the world all losing their minds, talking about how this would be a major capitulation to Iran — that Iran, that wasn't forced to give up all of its nuclear enrichment, all of its uranium, all of its enriched uranium, and wasn't forced to essentially cry surrender and cry uncle — that this would only empower Iran. And in some ways, they're right. But what they're not right about is that they cannot actually obtain any kind of scenario where Iran cries uncle. And that's actually where the big problem is. And so the terms that were put on the table — again, this is as the White House was being fired upon by supposedly a 21-year-old gunman who walked up to a security checkpoint and just started firing.

This is part of a handful of shootings that have either targeted Donald Trump or have targeted the White House in recent months. As this is happening, we are getting leaked out the terms of a deal that the Iranian side was really not privy to leaking at all. It was all the U.S. side saying that there was going to be an extension of the ceasefire, that the U.S. was going to keep their military assets in the region for the duration of 60 days, that the Strait of Hormuz would be completely open in 60 days, that Iran would be given the concession of being able to freely sell its oil, so no more blockade. So they would lift the blockade on the ports, and they would unfreeze some of these Iranian funds that are frozen in places like Qatari banks.

For example, the U.S. would issue some sanctions waivers, and there would be a draft of the Memorandum of Understanding with a statement that the war between Israel and Lebanon — really Hezbollah's struggle for resistance against Israeli aggression — would also come to an end, and that negotiations would then happen on the nuclear file and other issues like the Strait of Hormuz. They were told, Iran — and this is very interesting — that they shouldn't actually pay attention to Donald Trump's Truth Social, which is all over the place right now. Now Donald Trump is saying that he's in no rush to come to a deal because time is on their side, and he's never going to negotiate a deal as bad as Obama, for example.

But the truth of the matter is that Iran said they were told by U.S. officials that they shouldn't even pay attention to that because that is only possible — all of that is only for U.S. domestic consumption. And remember, Donald Trump's administration has essentially played the Iran war in this no-peace-but-no-war situation that they're trying to walk the line of as a way to manipulate markets, as a way to boost the stock market, as a way to try to lower oil prices so the economy globally won't overheat. All right, so this has been a complete disaster from the very outset of this so-called ceasefire that was brokered almost two months ago now.

This fully leaked Memorandum of Understanding, Iran is saying, is completely different from what Iran understands is actually in this memorandum, meaning that there are no commitments from Iran in this to hand over nuclear stockpiles, remove any equipment, shut down nuclear facilities, or commit at all to not building a nuclear bomb. And in fact, all of these issues are going to be deferred to a later period. But for this to start, the U.S. is going to need to give Iran a lot more than what they're saying they're giving. Iran is going to need to agree to release more than $100 billion of Iranian frozen assets.

They need to lift the blockade. They need to lift all oil and petrol sanctions during the negotiation period. They need to pay $270 billion to Iran in war reparations and accept that the Strait of Hormuz is essentially the sovereign territorial waters of the Islamic Republic of Iran and Oman. So these are terms that the United States and Donald Trump, to this day, continue to say they will never accept. Marco Rubio has also said this as well. So Benjamin Netanyahu had to tweet out after all of this, saying that Trump is the best friend that Netanyahu and Israel have ever had.

And that not only are they happy—and this is where the suspicious part is—not only are they happy that Trump is safe and the White House is safe after that dangerous shooting, but that he appreciates Donald Trump's commitment to Israel in the face of these negotiations. Other reports are saying that Netanyahu was pulling his hair out and is very angry, along with a lot of Israeli hawks, that the United States is trying to negotiate all of this independent of Israel. What do you believe? Well, I believe that there is no independence here, that Donald Trump is actually consulting with the Israelis every single step of the way, and that they're leaving a big door open now.

Because what Donald Trump is saying now is if he makes a deal with Iran, it's going to be a good and proper one. It's not going to be like Obama's, and he's not going to rush it. He doesn't make bad deals, and it's always going to be good for the Israelis. All right. And so that's what we have to remember, that a lot of this actually seems to be the U.S. buying time. The U.S. trying to, as now top neocons like Robert Kagan are saying, they're trying to put lipstick on a pig, and that lipstick is essentially glossing over the actual surrender that the United States needs to engage in if it's going to extricate itself from the war of aggression that is about to cause the global economy to explode in a matter of months. Now, this is the little secret that they don't want to talk about.

But economists, mainstream economists, for example in the Financial Times, are talking about how the global economy and oil continue to overheat in this direction. When all the oil reserves run out, especially on the U.S. side, what's going to happen is that oil is going to spike to $150 a barrel or more. And that's going to cause massive gas price hikes, massive inflation, and of course a Great Depression-like scenario where investment and purchasing power and all kinds of things are just going to absolutely tank. That is the future of the global economy because of this U.S.-Israeli war of aggression. And that is a future that Donald Trump, the GOP, but really the entirety of the U.S. political establishment, cannot handle. So they are trying to find a way to pause this conflict, not end it.

They're trying to find a way to pause the war so they can get some breathing room from the war of aggression of their own making. But again, with all of this, Iranian reports continue to get more and more interesting because now they're saying that there is no 60-day pause. Iran is not negotiating any 60-day extension. According to Iran's Tasnim News Agency, the draft refers to ending the war on all fronts, including Lebanon, the Strait of Hormuz, the end of the naval blockade, etc. Actually, the naval blockade will be addressed within 30 days, and nuclear negotiations will be set for a separate 60-day period. So that's a misreading, saying this is a 60-day ceasefire. No, it's a 60-day period from which to address the issues, but that the war is over.

So that's the understanding here, that the United States, of course, and the mainstream media, they are not trying to frame it as such. So, this is all that's on the table right now. But the fact that there has been no agreement signed, I think clearly demonstrates that Iran has called the U.S.'s bluff again. I think Iran is very much similar to how Russia—we saw what happened in the last couple of days to Ukraine, to Kiev—in response to the horrific attack on students and civilians in Lugansk. Last week, Russia fired a Roshnik missile. They fired a Roshnik missile. They fired Iskanders. They fired Zircons. They absolutely devastated a lot of Kiev's most critical military infrastructure in retaliation for the civilian killings that Ukraine is now regularly engaging in with the help, of course, of the CIA and the United States.

So it's similar to Russia, though, in the sense that Iran is in full understanding that any agreement with the United States cannot be trusted. So they are not going to engage in any kind of temporary pause that isn't going to benefit them. What Iran has done over the ceasefire period is consolidated its control of the Strait of Hormuz, rebuilt its military infrastructure, and made itself even more ready to fight another round of war. And this also includes rebuilding the infrastructure that was destroyed by U.S. bombings and continuing the political campaign around the country of rallying people in support of sovereignty, which actually has been going very well because people themselves are rallying in the streets on their own in the thousands, tens of thousands, hundreds of thousands almost every single day.

So this is a complete nightmare for the United States because you have looming an economic crisis. You have looming a restart of a war that Israel is pushing. The Zionists, the Lindsey Grahams, they have influence in the White House. Netanyahu has major influence in the White House. And Israel has every—this is in the policy documents that our friend Brian Berletic talks about all the time. And this is a complete setup. I 100% agree with it. Israel has the capacity to supposedly go it alone, meaning U.S. support can be in secret. Israel can fire a strike. We heard Marco Rubio say, why did we go into the war against Iran? Well, we had to help out Israel. Why? Because Israel was going to strike anyway.

How? Because the United States continues to assist Israel every step of the way, even covertly, so that it can have this plausible deniability on the U.S. side and say, well, we had to do it anyway, right? And that's kind of, I believe, what's happening. They're trying to get a pause, and they're giving time for that to work out. They're taking part in real talks in order to try to push Iran into a corner and say, look, you know, take these terms, take this as the best you're going to get. And Iran has continuously flouted it and said, no. We are not going to take the best you can give us, because the best you can give us still requires, essentially, capitulation in the final analysis.

And again, the New York Times continues, over and over and over again, to publish nonsense about how Iran has agreed in principle to dispose of its highly enriched uranium as part of negotiations. And that is just—first of all, that would never happen, because that's essentially impossible. That's not negotiating, that's just giving something to the United States. Nothing that the United States has said they would give amounts to any kind of equal exchange of terms. So now the White House is no longer really expecting a deal. Iran is not expecting a return to any kind of status quo.

It is not going to take any actions against itself that will weaken it while the United States continues, as they say, to sabotage key clauses of this memorandum of understanding. And that is the power of this U.S.-Israeli so-called alliance, because it is really an alliance of death and empire. It is one that is fully committed to war with Iran, and really war on the world, to try to subjugate the entire planet under the whims of multinational, transnational capital, finance capital, the military-industrial complex, and of course the states that politically manage their affairs. So that is where we are at with Iran. And then you had this shooting occur at the White House, which again is another example of a complete breakdown in the entirety of the architecture of empire.

Francis Fukuyama said recently, before all of these negotiations were leaked and said to have been occurring, he called Donald Trump—America's decline was a direct product of Trump's rise. And a lot of scholars—this is Francis Fukuyama, the end-of-history guy, right? After the fall of the Soviet Union, the U.S. is the only game in town. Its system is going to live forever. There is no alternative. There never will be an alternative to U.S. neoliberal imperial power. This is it. History is written. Go about your days, live, die under the whims of U.S. empire. Turns out he was completely wrong, and now he's trying to blame it all on Donald Trump. But the truth of the matter is, it didn't start with Donald Trump.

It actually started with the system itself that produced Donald Trump in the first place. And that system produces this social breakdown—the social, political, cultural breakdown happening in the United States—where people are angry, they're frustrated, they're incredibly mentally ill, they are anxious, they don't know what their future is going to be. They are abused. They are alienated. And you have a massive number of people experiencing this at some level—different conditions maybe—but at some level, they're all experiencing it. And now you see what happens. You see shootings at the White House. You see people targeting the power structure in a very haphazard way.

You have the potential for intelligence and government forces and, uh, the deep state to get involved in this kind of activity and cause chaos to distract from the real problem—to distract from the fact that we have not just a president but a power structure that is willing to use negotiations as a weapon to try to destroy another country. That we have a country ruled by oligarchs, corporate oligarchs, who are willing to impoverish and make life insufferable for the vast majority of people so they can get as rich as possible for as long as possible, until nuclear Armageddon, climate Armageddon—you pick the Armageddon. They don't care. They just want to get as rich as possible. They want to maintain power as much as possible.

They want to keep this system going, and the system of exploitation, as long as possible. And they understand now more than ever. This is why you have people like Fukuyama talking about decline. You have more and more people in the establishment talking about the American empire being in decline. You had Donald Trump himself address it in relation to his visit to China, getting triggered by Thucydides' Trap that Xi Jinping cited in his meeting, because they had no idea how to process the fact that while Thucydides' Trap doesn't necessarily mean that you are the declining power—that there is a declining power versus a rising one—it means that there's a rising power, and it means that the power that exists has to find out how to deal with that. But Donald Trump said, "Oh, well, Xi Jinping said that the nation was in decline, but not during me—during Biden." This is a complete exposure of how actually the United States, not only under Donald Trump but under this brutal corporate militarist regime, understands full well that the system they preside over is in decline and that they are becoming more and more outmoded.

And we are seeing this in these negotiations, full stop. We're seeing Iran be able to assert its sovereignty directly. Forget a deal if Iran just continues to be able to assert its sovereignty and prevent an attack. Forget peace treaties, forget papers. The United States' word is not good. There is no good in the U.S.'s word under these warmongers and these elites. They will continue to pursue war with Iran.

And Iran, and really the entirety of the world that's trying to build a new order, the best they can do is to build their own kind of systems, to build their own kind of defenses, to build their own kind of development projects and modes of development, and to continue to raise the level of their ability to deter attacks. That's the best they can do until people in the United States figure out what kind of power they want to have—whether they want to continue to allow oligarchs to run the White House like Donald Trump, or to have their lieutenants like Joe Biden. Whatever it is, if they want to continue the two-party duopoly, dominate them, police them, surveil them, make their lives harder, ensure that they're continuously tracked and followed, that their lives get worse, that they see debt pile up, impoverishment, homelessness, you name it—race wars, racism, you know, wars at home, ICE, all of this. Americans, people in the United States, have to wage their own kind of war for sovereignty, which really is a class war at the end of the day. And every person who belongs to a particular section of this class war, whether you're on the side of the class war that is powerless or you are on the side of the class war that has power right now and is looking to keep it.

Everyone is going to figure out where they stand and act accordingly. But nonetheless, I mean, what we are seeing is a massive shift in the global order. The news shows us almost every single day. You have Russia firing off some of the most advanced weapons at Ukraine in retaliation for what is now not just a war of attrition, but really soon to be a European-U.S. war of total aggression on Russia. That's what it's building up toward. That's what Russia is preparing for. And that's why Russia is now showing and demonstrating, firing these weapons at Kiev, as it does every so often, to demonstrate to Europe, to demonstrate to the United States, that if they go too far, well, the damage will be irrevocable. As Russia continues to build up its own economy, its own defenses, stabilize itself, which it has done an incredible job of.

Its currency is the most booming currency on the market right now in relation to the U.S. dollar. So Russia is doing what it needs to do. China has already done it. We saw the Xi Jinping-Trump meeting demonstrate that—exactly where China stands. It is really the center of global power right now. Countries are coming to China for development, for dialogue, for diplomacy, and for really what the economic as well as the overall future of the world is going to look like in terms of priorities, right? Poverty alleviation, development, renewable energy—we can go on and on and on, right? High technology, AI, robotics, all of this. China is going to be the leader, while the U.S. will attempt to thrash about to try to corner these markets. But ultimately, they will drown—the United States empire will drown in its debt, will drown in its wars. And that's where things currently stand.

So it's a real delicate situation right now. We're in a real crisis because, yes, there is a social fabric breakdown from these shootings that happen every so often. But there's also what I believe is a huge push by the American empire to shoot itself in the foot, to continue to go down a path of its own self-destruction, knowing that it actually can't be destroyed on its own. It will decline. It will collapse in many respects. It will lose ground continuously to China economically, technologically. It will continue to lose the ability to dictate terms to the rest of the world. All this is true.

But the United States will not lose the ability to wage endless wars, will not lose the ability to try to enrich itself at the expense of the rest of the world. Look at what's happening with the Strait of Hormuz. Yeah, it is really getting close to the point where we are going to see a global economic meltdown. And in many ways, we already are in that. But these LNG companies are making a killing. Wall Street's making a killing. So they don't care. So that is, and some are saying that it's a grand strategy, which I don't believe, actually. I don't believe that the United States empire, that the capitalist, the global capitalist elite, the oligarchs, that they think that they can run anything.

But nonetheless, whether you think it's a grand strategy or the Strait of Hormuz situation is just a byproduct of U.S. imperial decline, with U.S. imperial overreach, with U.S. imperial aggression, all of those things can be the same. We're in a time of contradiction here, a historic period. And I wanted to get on here to just show you that that's actually the case, no matter what we are looking at. It is a huge shift worldwide. We have to continue to follow this. But regardless of whether a memorandum of understanding is signed or not, regardless of whether there's a deal, whether there's talks in the future, the threat of war against Iran will continue.

And of course, the threat of escalating war in other areas will continue because that is what the U.S. empire really is all about, until the people of the United States who oppose this begin to do more of their part and begin to try to change realities on the ground inside of where they are governed. And in many cases, most people see that governance as illegitimate. So we are getting to the point of that crisis of legitimacy turning into some kind of pushback. But for now, we've got to continue to follow these developments and continue to make sure that Americans, Westerners, and everybody understands that the world is not ever going to be the same.
